No such problem exists in Chinese, because the third personal pronoun is pronounced ta for both male and female. In the written language, ta (他) is composed of the radical ren (人) meaning "human" or "humanity" without gender distinction. However, since the May 4th Movement of 1919, under the impact of Western literature and for the purposes of translating Western materials, Chinese language reformers such as Hu Shi, devised four written forms for the same ta (i.e., the third personal pronoun singular); the ta with ren radical (人) is reserved exclusively for "he" or "him." For the pronoun "she" or "her," the female radical is used instead of the original ren (人). The ta with a cow radical (牛) is for neuter gender. In addition, the ta (他) referring to God or spiritual beings is given the radical shi (示) to signify a spiritual quality without sexual implication, thus forestalling a recent controversy as to whether God is male or female, or both. By the way, the Aztec language Yejua for the third personal pronoun is also non-gender specific like the Chinese, because the ancient Aztec religion believed that God or the creator was both male and female, two in one. This corresponds to the Chinese myth of creation and the ying yang principles I mentioned earlier.

It is a paradox that in such a strongly sexist society like that of China there should be a non-gender specific pronoun like ta (他). If it had a universal application, it would solve the "she/he" or "he/she" dilemma in English. Besides this genderless pronoun, the Chinese have two other
